Expanded Course Description

This course is designed to examine, in an increasingly complex international and national context, the theories, principles and practices of law and social justice. Definitions of human rights and social justice vary.

In general, human rights are those basic rights that belong to the people because they are human beings regardless of nationality, race, gender, sexual orientation or religion, without which people cannot live in dignity. Human rights involving the dignity and equality of all persons are generally written down in national and international legal instruments. Followers of religious natural law believe that these human rights are derived ultimately from spiritual sources. However, according to cosmopolitans, they do not depend on religious grounding or on legal recognition for their existence. Secular cosmopolitans consider them to be indivisible, inalienable and universal and cannot be compromised. They believe these rights are derived from rational observation and analysis. Based on a belief in a social contract, contractarians consider that human rights must be written down and protected by positive law against arbitrary interference by governments. They call these rights civil liberties. Human rights, whatever their source, are considered by the United Nations and most societies to include life, justice, freedom and equality.

In general, social justice is the concept that community and state activity should be based on just and equitable treatment of all peoples regardless of colour, socioeconomic class, gender, age or sexual preference. Social justice requires fairness and respect for the rights of both the majority and minorities in a country. Achieving social justice implies a duty on citizens, civic society groups, states and international institutions to deal with issues facing types of individuals and groups that are disadvantaged and/or underrepresented in society such as: women; gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender persons; children; linguistic and ethnic minorities; aboriginal peoples; racialized communities; immigrants and refugees; poor and undernourished persons; the elderly and persons with disabilities. Social justice is thus concerned with distributive justice whereby decision makers seek to ensure that the benefits and burdens of public policy are fairly and equally distributed. Social justice, where possible, seeks reconciliation between opposing groups and restorative solutions whereby victims of past injustices are compensated and rehabilitated. Increasingly achieving social justice is forcing advocates to incorporate principles and practices of enhanced environmental maintenance and protection into their activities to ensure human sustainability.

The historical, legal and jurisprudential perspective utilized in this course surveys evolving international instruments, national statutory and constitutional protections, especially those relating to or recognized by Canada. Human rights law is examined as an evolving instrument of social change impacted by changing philosophical, cultural, economic, security and political factors. Progress on recognizing and achieving human rights begins with the Magna Carta and the English Bill of Rights, the American Declaration of Independence and the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen. Progress has been slow because of the doctrine of state sovereignty arising out of the Treaty of Westphalia.

This course will examine the progress of social justice and human rights during the interwar period between WWI and WWII; through the “Golden age of Human Rights” with the passage of the UN Declaration of Human Rights in 1948; to the later passage of related international instruments and President Carter’s attempts at advancing human rights; to the more recent setbacks with the Iranian Revolution, the 9/11 attacks, the London bombings and the current Syrian and Egyptian situations. We will then examine the current state of affairs and how advocates of human rights and social justice are pursuing their goals through state and non-state processes. In particular, these advocates have now coupled future human rights achievement with environmental protection due to increasing ecological vulnerability brought about by globalization, climate change and resource exhaustion.
