COURSE DESCRIPTION

Nelson Mandela was imprisoned for 26 years for his opposition to discrimination on the basis of race in South Africa; US soldiers exchanged photographs of detainees they had tortured and degraded in Iraq; a child in Afghanistan is compelled to leave primary school and work long hours in a carpet factory to help his family out of grinding poverty; a union leader is killed because of his efforts to organize fellow employees to protest dangerous working conditions; disabled women march for government programs to help them get jobs that their male counterparts are getting; aboriginal people blockade a road to protest against the development of land they claim belongs to them...these situations that we hear about happening every day all over the world are not only examples of challenges to human dignity, but also are often circumstantial or literal violations of actual laws. What prevents these violations of laws from being remedied in societies, communities and nations is most often a lack of knowledge about their content, or even their existence. The laws that seek to protect people all over the world against violations of their dignity are contained in the branch of public international law known as International Human Rights Law (IHRL). Governments, industry and courts are increasingly turning to this body of international rules for guidance on addressing claims of human rights violations in their own countries by their constituents and citizens. IHRL is therefore an essential area of knowledge for graduates of Legal Studies and Law programmes to possess before they seek employment in legal practice or policy work. What differs this course from one that is offered within the Human Rights Programme is a greater focus on the laws (treaties) that relate to specific human rights violations and on applying the legal tools available to address that violation.

COURSE OBJECTIVES

This course will introduce the student to 1) the evolution and current status of international human rights law; 2) specific types of human rights that are enshrined in existing international and regional treaties (written laws) and particular groups of people who are especially vulnerable to violations of their rights; and 3) the institutions and procedures that exist at the international level for protecting against or remedying violations of those laws. The material will be imparted through lectures, assigned readings and case studies that apply the lecture and reading material.

REQUIRED TEXTS

Required Readings are indicated in each lecture. Some additional articles, as well as case study exercises, will be distributed in class. Lecture Power Point slides are posted on WebCT and students are encouraged to print them out beforehand and bring them to class, where they can add notes and clarify points.

EVALUATIONAll components must be completed in order to get a passing grade*(1) Legal Research assignment- 30% of final grade

Each student will create a handbook or manual for a selected non-governmental human rights organization. The assignment will involve the analysis and application of international human rights law to a local or regional human rights problem that the NGO is trying to address. The handbook is intended to be an educational tool for the NGO's constituents informing them of the international and local human rights law applicable to the specific issue and of the nature of the legal tools that the NGO is using to address the problem.

(2) Presentation - 25% of final grade

Each student will be required to give a 15-20 minute presentation about the NGO s/he is creating the manual for, the legal issue being addressed, the applicable international and regional human rights law and the legal proceedings being used to address the problem. This assignment is meant to be not only an academic endeavour, but also a creative one.

(3) Case Study completion– 15% of final grade

A case study exercise will follow each lecture, applying the material just imparted. In lieu of the instructor merely taking attendance, students will sign their name on a sheet upon completion of each exercise.

(4) Final open book examination - 30% of final grade

Students will write a final open book exam consisting of two essay questions on any of the topics covered in the lectures and readings. The goal of the exam is to help the student master the basic rules and issues of modern international human rights law, a knowledge that will prove useful in his/her future career, whether that be the practice of law or work in public or corporate policy. For the purpose of writing the exam, the student will be permitted access only to the treaties covered in the course and to the lecture notes.
