Moving towards sustainability: The energy transition in the Netherlands

Achieving sustainability will require fundamental changes in energy, transport and agricultural systems. Pioneering work in the Netherlands suggests that effectively managing transitions in such key sectors will require new models of governance. ‘Transition management’, adopted by the Dutch government and gaining increased international attention, is one such effort to apply new thinking in order to transform our energy and environmental footprint.

Please join us to hear about the innovative research that is being undertaken at the Dutch Research Institute for Transitions (DRIFT) on achieving sustainability in the energy sector.
