In the 1980s, a number of philosophers argued that perception is analog. In the ensuing years, these arguments were forcefully criticized, leaving the thesis in doubt. This paper draws on Weber's Law, a well-entrenched finding from psychophysics, to advance a new argument that perception is analog.