

CRST 4001 [0.5 credit]
Advanced Critical Race Studies- Contemporary Critical Race Stories

In this advanced interdisciplinary seminar, students will explore issues of race, colonialism and feminisms including theories of racial and cultural difference, structures of privilege and power, and forms of resistance. Intersectional theoretical approaches to anti-colonial and feminist analyses of racial subjugation, and engagements with Black, Indigenous and women of colour feminisms. This semester students will explore storytelling. How have the stories of racialized people been told? Who has the right to tell these stories? And what does it mean when our stories conflict or are contradictory? This course will use multi disciplinary and multi media interpretations of the stories of racialized people to consider how can these stories move people to create a better and more just world? This course is currently scheduled in person, but may be modified based on current circumstances and Public Health guidance.