The Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies presents a virtual lecture with Dani Kranz

Jews and the New Antisemitism in Germany:

Empowerment, Symbolic Politics, and Jews as Actors

Dani Kranz, Photo Credit Kfir Harbi

Dani Kranz is an anthropologist who conducts fieldwork in Europe and the Middle East studying Jews and Israelis in Germany and non-Jewish migrants from the global North in Israel. She is a DAAD visiting professor anthropologist at Ben Gurion University, Israel and is a consultant to the High Commissioner of the German government for Jewish life and in the fight against antisemitism.

Monday, March 7, 7 pm EST

To attend, email Registration.Jewish.Studies@carleton.ca to get the Zoom link.

Please: For security reasons, do not share the link with anyone else.

Media reports are rife about the new antisemitism in Germany. Antisemitism in Germany today is framed as an unwanted consequence of immigration from Arab/ Muslim majority countries. Certainly, some immigrants from these countries hold negative, antisemitic and antizionist attitudes. However, Germans who are not from immigrant backgrounds hold these attitudes too. How does this antisemitism relate to Jews in Germany? We will sketch out a short history of Jews in Germany post-1945, explain the notion of symbolic politics around things Jewish, and foreground Jews as actors with their own agenda and agency. How has the German Jewish population grown through immigration from the former Soviet Union and Israel? These Jews, alongside German born and raised Jews, have been making Germany their home: new, diverse, and self-confident. Jewish life in Germany that has not been seen since the 1930s. This lecture asks simple, but complex questions to unravel what is going on in Germany. What data is available, collected for what purpose, and who are they key actors?

