

MASTER OF ARTS IN Philosophy

Carleton's Department of Philosophy has two broad strengths in contemporary philosophy: philosophy of mind, language and knowledge on the one hand, and moral, social and political philosophy, on the other. Courses and research are also available in history of philosophy.

Students begin tackling graduate-level work in a supportive and collegial proseminar, followed by a research seminar in which they develop plans for a thesis or research essay. An exciting variety of graduate seminars is offered, with new topics added every year. They have included Kant, women and early modern philosophy, the Stoics on emotions, consciousness and agency, justice and equality, development ethics and philosophical naturalism. Students can also explore their research interests in small group or one-to-one graduate tutorials.

Our faculty are highly regarded researchers with numerous grants, awards and citations to their credit. Some prominent research interests in the department are:

- Action theory
- Philosophy of mind, psychology and cognitive science
- Scientific models and ontology
- Philosophy of social science
- Reference and indexicality in thought and language

Prepare to make your philosophical contribution.

- The epistemology of testimony
- Comparative ethics
- Development and global ethics
- Distributive justice
- Bioethics
- Ancient and early modern philosophy
- Feminist philosophy
- Philosophy of life

We also offer a collaborative specialization in Digital Humanities.

The Philosophy MA can lead to two interdisciplinary PhD programs. The Ethics and Public Affairs (EPAF) program is unique in that it combines ethics and political philosophy with social science and policy analysis. The Institute of Cognitive Science offers an integrated PhD that trains researchers to consider the tools and approaches of related disciplines such as philosophy, psychology, artificial intelligence, linguistics and cognitive neuroscience.

Admission Requirements

An honours bachelor's degree, or equivalent, in philosophy, with at least a B+ average or higher.

“What I remember most about the Carleton Philosophy MA program is how supported I was by the faculty — to forge a path that would best advance my research goals. The mentorship I received allowed me to build core competencies as a critical thinker, as an analytical writer and as a confident communicator.”

— Sarah Rosenhek (MA/04), Executive Director of Auberge Shalom pour femmes
