Course Description and Objectives

In the post-Cold War era, war has been characterised by human rights and humanitarian violations on a massive scale. This course examines how armed conflict has been shaped by global forces, focusing specifically on how illicit and licit global economies fuel or flourish in situations of organised political violence. Thus, despite the globalisation of the human right regime, globalisation also represents a central context for human rights catastrophes. Moreover, the course will examine how globalisation shapes the emergence of new political identities that may give rise to conflict. Yet, the globalisation of human rights discourse has also prompted the rise of a formidable apparatus of strategies to address the atrocities associated with political violence. In particular, this course examines the reinvigoration of cosmopolitanism, various modes of transitional justice and statebuilding interventionism, while engaging the debate on universalism versus cultural relativism. The course draws on historical case studies in the immediate post-Cold War period to help inform our understanding of contemporary problems.
