CHRISTINA PASQUA

This course focuses on the social life and presence of Evangelical Christianities in North America and globally. Through a media history that integrates visual, material, and ethnographic studies to inform our discussion, we will ask: what does it mean to be a "Bible-believer" both historically and today? How are technologies such as the printing press, television, music, and social media implicated in the growth and perception of this religious movement? How do race, gender, capitalist production, and national politics play a role in these issues? Join the course to find out!
