Course Description:
This seminar draws on student interests to explore contemporary Indigenous political, social, and cultural action through the lenses of language, place, and power. Through these lenses, we will examine ethnographic perspectives on state processes of land claims and treaties; landscape and place; the co-construction of scientific knowledge; language endangerment and revitalization; and relationships with the environment. While the course is global in perspective, particular attention is given to northern Canada.