COURSE DESCRIPTION

We focus on three broad themes empirically and analytically: 1) examining racism as shifting forms of racial knowledge/power, which intersect with other differentiations such as gender, sexuality and class, and which produce a myriad of reactions such as resistance, internalization, or circumvention; 2) examining racism as nationalist practices whereby a coinciding relation between a self, one's race, one's ethnicity, and a territory is imaged and asserted, to the exclusion or subordination of others in nation-scapes; 3) examining how experiences of childhood and youth are shaped by racism, ethnicity, migration, and nationalism.
